Appraisal Bias – Where Do We Stand Now?

The issue of systemic real estate value inequities, sometimes referred to as "appraisal bias", in communities of color has received a lot of attention in the press and from federal and state public policy makers. There have been many complaints and lawsuits filed against real estate appraisers alleging that they did something illegal and/or inappropriate in the valuation of a property based upon someone's personal characteristics. This session will explore the current landscape of appraisal bias, and the progress made toward addressing solving the greater issues associated with systemic issues that cause real estate value inequities.

DCF Applied to Non-Stabilized Property: Market value or investment value?

Martin Skolnik | Appraisal reviewer | Semi-retired

The distinction between market value and investment value is important in mitigating lending risk in fluctuating real estate markets. In past real estate-focused economic downturns (Savings-and-Loan/RTC experiences of the late-1980s/early-1990s through the "Great Recession" of the late-2000s/early-2010s), commercial properties that defaulted were likely to have loan terms based on assumptions of speculative future leasing or unit sales (i.e., non-stabilized renovation property, new construction in lease-up, and residential subdivisions sell-offs. This presentation will discuss the potential that lenders are basing their lending on non-stabilized income-producing property on value derived from misapplied and mislabeled methodology (i.e., investment value) instead of market value.

Adjustments to Capitalization Rates: Why Not?

Martin Skolnik | Review Appraiser | Semi-retired

Part of typical appraisal practice for development of capitalization rates is that the appraiser narrativize differences between comparable sales and subject with non-specific and subjective verbiage such as “The subject is better located than Comparable #2 and in worse condition than Comparable #3; therefore the capitalization rate is X%.” This presentation will cover why a broad-brush analysis of capitalization rates is not sufficient; that a more structured and consistent methodology is necessary (similar to adjustment process in the Sales Comparison Approach); and that this enhanced methodology is supported by leading texts and economic literature.
